Excerpt: . tributed the victory to the latter; then they celebrated in wanton half meanings, the gallantries of the day, and finished by pastorals like bravuraa. Women of fashion would have heard them with rapture. t When the daughters of Pierus had finished, Calliope took on herself the task of singly replying to them. She sung theu the powerful fecundity of the Master of the universe, who animates all beings with a breath, and, with a look, plunges them into annihilation; then she sung the adventures of Deucalion, and Pyrrha: -- Indignant at the crimes of men, Jupiter had covered the earth with an immense sea, and the human species was no more. The highest mountains had concealed their summits j one alone yet elevated its head above the waves; it was Mount Parnassus, situated between Attica and Boetia. Over this vast and liquid plain, amidst floating bodies of men, animals, and trees, voyaged a frail barque, at once the sport of the winds and the waves; it bore a happy and respectable pair, and virtue herself was saved with Deucalion and Pyrrha. The breath of the winds, 01* rather that of the Eternal, impelled them to the summit of Mount Parnassus. It was there that they landed with trepidation, and that, casting a trembling glance around, they considered with horror the boundless tomb of the human race. Meanwhile the waters decreased, and they gradually discovered the mountains, the elevated plains; but nature was dead...
