This means that the foot was more or less checked in extension and dragged along, with a resultant closing up of entire separation between the feet crosswise. Besides this we have a peculiar toeing in of the foot carrying the toeweight, which is in part due to the direction of off hind foot. Such an invyard direction of the near fore, or rather such a direction to the opposite side of its normal direction, makes the total result doubly faulty. These directions may be entirely due to faulty paring of feet, which is so an essential matter in pointing, and often has been proved so in other experiments more directly under my control. At any rate, we have seen the effect of the weight on near fore, though through other conditions its effect on hind action was not visible. Loping under the saddle had probably affected this gelding's open trotting action and inherited pacing tendencies may explain the extensions of two feet on one side (Fig. 126) instead of on the opposite side, as in the true trotting action. Even with this faulty gait he could show miles in about 2:25, the near fore extension favoring an easier taking of turns. It should be added that in this experiment the variations of strides from the average were far more regular and even than in the previous trial, the fore being but slightly more irregular than the...
